I have decided to create a personal website that demonstrates my technical skills as well as providing information about myself. The website will consist of 5 pages including a home page, an about me page, a page showing the current courses I am taking, a CV page, and a page to demonstrate additional technical skills in Html, CSS and Javascript. The general design of the web pages will include a consistent header, footer and initial main content area for all web pages. Each individual page will have sections that will break up each individual content area. The home page will have 4 separate areas of content to navigate to the rest of the site and give initial ideas of the content on the site. The About me page will be broken into 4 sections with 2 sections describing myself and interests, and 2 more sections with media to emphasize the content. The Courses page will show the 5 different courses I am taking for each semester with buttons that will switch between displaying winter and fall courses. The CV will feature 3 sections with my 'contact' info, work experience, and education. The final page will feature a set of additional skills separated on the page.

The color scheme for the website will be a monochromatic red, with large amounts of greys. This will be a cohesive design that will tie the website together by not overcomplicating the website with clashing colors, and allowing for different sections of the website to be more easily divided.. The fonts used for the main sections of text will be serif and sans-serif to allow for easier readability, with the majority being serif text. The choices for the color and fonts will show both contrast and repetition, with different shades of red separating the sections of the page while also sharing similar schemes across the site, while the fonts will be different to separate the sections of the website, but similar by being serif fonts to have noticeable differences.
